HISTORY OF STERLING

Originally part of the long narrow area called Voluntown, this northern section separated and obtained town privileges from the Connecticut Assembly on the second Thursday of May, 1794. The name given was that of a temporary resident, Dr. John Sterling, who promised the town a Library in return for the honor of naming the Town after him. Dr. Sterling failed to make good on his promise, but his name still carried on with the Town. The Town did obtain a Library, in time, by soliciting private donations.

The first Town Meeting was held June 9, 1794. It was held at the home of Robert Dixon on Sterling Hill.

The first post office was established in Sterling on October 1, 1809, the name later being changed to Sterling Hill.

The American Manufacturing Company, also known as Potter's Factory, was the first cotton mill in Sterling. It was situated on the Quandock River. It was established about 1800, followed by the Sterling Manufacturing Company on the Moosup River in 1808.

Local Industrialist William Pike pioneered in using chlorine as a bleaching agent for cloth and also established for the use of the dyer distilleries or sap works that would extract the first pyroligneous acid made in this country. His son James discovered a process of coloring with fast black that was superior to any in use then. With the advent of the first railroad in 1854, which connected Providence with Hartford, this made the distribution of materials much easier than before and contributed to the economic base of Sterling. Oneco, as this village within the boundaries of the town of Sterling, is called, was named after Owaneco, son of the Mohegan Indian sachem Uncas, who claimed ownership of large tracts of Eastern CT. land in the early colonial days.

About the year 1820 Henry Sabin built a cotton factory here in Sterling and named the village Sabinville. Smith and Williams began quarrying granite in this vicinity in the 1850's, an industry which is still active and alive today.
